WELCOME

A little room for yourself.

You have spent years making room for other people: their schedules, their needs, their worries. There may be things you would like to make room for now, too.

These short lessons offer practical reminders for everyday life. Some may feel familiar. Others may give you words for something you have wanted to say.

Read in any order. Keep what helps. You do not need to change your whole life to make one part of it more comfortable.

A SIMPLE WAY TO BEGIN

Read one lesson. Choose one small thing to try. Come back whenever you need a reminder.

USE THE CONTENTS TO JUMP TO ANY LESSON.

LESSON 01

You're allowed to have plans of your own.

Your daughter calls on Tuesday. Could you watch the grandchildren on Friday? You were planning to have lunch with a friend. Before you check the time, you hear yourself saying yes.

You love your family. You also wanted that lunch. Both things can be true.

A personal plan does not become less important because it is enjoyable. You do not need a medical appointment or an emergency to have a reason to be unavailable.

Before answering the next request, pause and check what you had planned. You may decide to help, suggest another time, or keep your arrangement. Let it be a choice you have actually considered.

WORDS YOU CAN USE

"I have plans Friday afternoon. I could help Saturday morning, if that works."

LESSON 14

A short, kind no is enough.

Someone asks you to organize another family dinner. You are tired. You start explaining your week, hoping to find a reason everyone will accept.

A clear answer can be kinder than a reluctant yes that leaves you exhausted and resentful.

You can acknowledge the invitation, say what you can manage, and stop there. If you want to offer an alternative, make sure it is something you are willing to do.

If you already made a commitment, give the other person as much notice as possible when changing it. If the request is new, take a moment before agreeing.

The other person may be disappointed. You can listen to that feeling without immediately offering to do more.

TRY THIS NEXT TIME

"I cannot host this time, but I would love to come." Offer another option only if you mean it.

LESSON 25

Make a holiday plan that doesn't depend on an invitation.

Thanksgiving is getting close, and you still do not know what your children are doing. You keep the day open, just in case.

It is understandable to hope for an invitation. Waiting does not have to be your only plan.

Ask about arrangements early. If your family is celebrating elsewhere, give yourself time to choose something you might enjoy: lunch with a friend, a community meal, or a favorite film and a phone call you arrange in advance.

A smaller celebration may still bring sadness. You do not have to pretend otherwise. It can also hold a good conversation, a familiar recipe, or a new tradition.

Having your own plans lets you care for the day you are going to have, even when it differs from the one you hoped for.

ONE SMALL STEP

Choose one upcoming holiday. Contact someone you would enjoy spending part of it with, and suggest a specific plan.
